Q: Can a user provide a list of images to be used as an in-app ad? Can a user provide a list of images to be used as an in-app ad, like in the iAd Network's App Store for example? I'm interested in the strategy for presenting the list of images to the user. I'm not interested in the process used to determine which images get selected for the list, I'm just interested in the way the list is presented to the user. I'm using iOS4. A: I've written a tutorial on how to do this: The basic idea is that you store the information about images you want to display as an array of AdImages in your game delegate. When your application launches (or you fetch the first instance of the AdNetwork in your application delegate), it uses this information to generate a template with the correct number of images and then apply them to the ad view. The invention is directed to a molded plastic molded-in valve housing which has a closure part which may be either displaceably or rotatably connected with a valve body by means of a connecting member, and which closure part has an internal bore which opens toward an outlet opening of the valve housing. Molded-in valve housings of the aforescribed type are particularly used with electronically controlled internal combustion engines. The closure part is not only used to close the outlet opening of the valve housing in the end position, but it must be prevented from rotation in the opposite direction when it is closed. To this end, it is known to form the external surface of the closure part in a contoured shape with a groove which is shaped to mesh with a groove which is formed at the end of the connecting member, and this groove, in turn, runs coaxially to the internal bore in the closure part. This measure assures that the closure part cannot rotate. In the end position, however, the valve housing may not be connected with the connecting member so that it will be possible for the closure part to be rotated into the open position. This is disadvantageous in that the closure part may become detached from the valve housing and may fall to the ground and be damaged. It is known to place the connecting member on the side of the closure part where there is a large distance from the valve body, that
