In 1947, 21 prominent physicians from major medical organizations of the US, UK, Canada, and Australia met at Nuremberg to discuss ethically important issues. The Nuremberg code focused on four key ethical principles: 1) Informed consent is the basis of medical research. 2) Experimentation without consent should be banned. 3) In all clinical research, subjects should be protected from harm. 4) Patients should be fully informed about risks, benefits, and alternatives to the procedure or therapy. These principles of medical ethics, which today form the basis of medical practice in the US and UK, were not established with the intention of formulating a code of ethics but as part of the legal proceedings that resulted from Nazi medical atrocities during World War II. Approximately 20,000 mostly Jewish patients and prisoners were experimented on at medical research institutions in Germany from 1938 to 1945. Some of these experiments resulted in serious injuries and even death. After the war, Nazi physicians were tried for their crimes in an international court. The resulting conviction of Rudolf Höss, the commander of the Auschwitz concentration camp, helped usher in the age of ethical principles in medical research. The origin and purpose of the Nuremberg Code is now widely recognized. While the spirit of the Nuremberg Code is still embedded in modern medical ethics, the code was never intended to be binding or legally enforceable, and it was never written in a way that would prevent clinicians or researchers from using it. Some Nuremberg Code principles were eventually adopted as part of the Declaration of Helsinki. Today, physicians must understand the principles and guidelines of medical ethics, and no one should misrepresent them. In the same way, physicians should understand the principles and guidelines of evidence-based medicine and should not misrepresent it.MARTIN COUNTY — A plan to

Cockburn in the House of Commons gave the most damning account of the House of Commons, focusing on its personalised politics and policies, and arguing that its "relationship with the real world is becoming more asocial and less coherent". In previous terms, as the Labour MEP Claude Desama wrote, "the House used to be the guardian and promoter of a coherent sense of society, of the common values of fairness and equity." Jonathan Isaby in The Guardian also noted how the Commons "didn't capture the mood of the nation," and how "the House of Commons has never been so disconnected from what a great many of its own constituents were up to." Examples Some examples of the idiosyncrasies of the House include: On the first day of the new parliament in May 2010, the Conservatives lost 56 seats and the Liberal Democrats just over 30 seats. The Speaker had in fact announced that if there were more than 100 sitting days until the next general election (there are currently 326), the speaker would stop the House from voting on Government business until there were 100 sitting days. However, when Labour MP Gerald Howarth called for a recount, he stated it would take six weeks to decide on, making it an example of how six weeks were needed in order to allow for the new Government to be able to govern effectively. The Government was later defeated in the battle to be allowed a business statement on the matter, and the "Sitting Days" motion was passed, allowing the Commons to vote on Government business. In December 2004, a statement from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Gordon Brown, that he intended to raise VAT was met with an immediate vote, and the Labour deputy leader John Prescott took to the Dispatch Box to rebut Brown's statement. The Government lost by only eight votes. Prescott said he had been in a taxi, in which a fellow passenger had said that people didn't want to hear what he had to say, but he persisted. On reflection, he thought that it had been a mistake to have spoken, and that it was no accident that Tony Blair had consistently refused to speak in the House. When Gordon Brown was Chancellor, the best known House of Commons person of the time was not Prime Minister Tony Blair, but rather John Major's Chancellor of the Exchequer, Norman Lamont. Lamont would repeatedly use the
