The download button is on the last page of the download..Iron restriction induces a number of physiological adaptations, including the acquisition of unique immunological characteristics. As mammals cannot synthesize heme, the iron-containing cofactor for proteins containing the Fe-S cluster, they must obtain it from the diet. Since iron is a poor nutrient, when iron is limited the body must obtain iron from food much more efficiently in order to meet its iron needs. We will explore the physiological significance of an aspect of dietary iron-regulation, namely the mechanisms that modulate the absorption of heme from the intestine in response to iron status. Iron is absorbed in the small intestine through passive and active transport processes mediated by specific membrane transporters. Iron is transported from the intestine into the blood by iron transporting proteins in the plasma.
