The mobile communication systems are developed to provide the user with voice communication services on the move. With the rapid advance of technologies, the mobile communication systems have evolved to support high speed data communication services as well as the standard voice communication services. However, the resource shortage and user demands for higher speed services in the current mobile communication systems spur the evolution to more advanced mobile communication systems. Recently, interest in the next generation mobile communication system is growing. The Long Term Evolution (LTE) is a technology designed to support high speed packet communications in the downlink and the uplink. The LTE is a technology aimed at supporting high-speed packet communications with the transmission rate of up to 100 Mbps, which is higher than the data transmission rate of current 2G/3G/4G communication systems. In the LTE communication system, the device-to-device (D2D) communication refers to the direct communication between multiple user equipments (UEs) or the direct communication between multiple UEs and the network. The D2D communication may include such communication as peer-to-peer communication, machine-to-machine (M2M) communication, communication between a UE and a network, and communication between multiple UEs. In the D2D communication, the UEs exchange information on their proximity, and establish a UE-to-UE communication link, thereby reducing the burden on the conventional communication links. For example, the D2D communication may reduce a bad effect caused by the load of a base station (BS) and the traffic of an anchor BS, increase the throughput in the cell boundary of the BS, and reduce the power consumption of a UE through distributing the traffic. However, if the D2D communication is performed between UEs in close proximity, unintended D2D communication may occur between the UEs due to the phenomenon, such as path loss, shadowing, and fading caused by various obstacles. In this case, the D2D communication may be performed, and thus the communication resources may be wasted.
