On 25 April, the German tabloid Bild announced: “Boaty McBoatface is dead!” This was a reference to the name given by British scientists to the unmanned ocean-going robot they’d spent several years developing and christening the RRS Sir David Attenborough. The British ship was named after the 83-year-old broadcaster, who is one of the world’s most respected natural scientists, and is often called the patron saint of the natural sciences. (I had the honour of dining with him and presenting him with the 2017 World Science Spirit Award. He was as charming and generous as always.) The scientists behind Attenborough-bot were delighted and relieved that they had finally succeeded in nailing down a name, while others were utterly miffed that their robot wasn’t allowed to make it on to any post-christening receptions, including the company of Sir David, who was flabbergasted by the name. But there’s a sadder tale of how the name Boaty McBoatface came about. The RRS Sir David Attenborough: Ship of the future

The technology for this kind of autonomous ship was already available, based on designs used by search-and-rescue vessels. A mechanical engineer working for the National Oceanography Centre, Southampton, Jon Humphries, was the project lead, while his colleague John Maynard was the chief engineer. Their job was to create a robotic platform for the UK’s Office for Space and Seabed Policy (a department of the Ministry of Defence, which manages the UK’s maritime and space policy).
