clinical management. During the past decade, therapeutic strategies for acute lymphoblastic leukaemia (ALL) have evolved from conventional chemotherapy to rationalised combinations of agents, including monoclonal antibodies, with a view to improving clinical outcomes. Technological advances in molecular cytogenetics and quantitative assessment of minimal residual disease have enabled detection of prognostic factors, and a greater understanding of the biology of the disease. In the course of this process, cytogenetic and molecular markers that characterise distinct disease subsets are emerging. These observations may allow better selection of patients for therapy, and may ultimately contribute to a revision of the classification of ALL. Cytogenetic analysis is now widely considered to have a major role in the initial evaluation of ALL, and is the basis for risk stratification in children as well as in adults. A new concept, the minimal residual disease technique, shows promise in evaluating drug efficacy in adults, where a large number of active antileukaemia agents now exist. In some applications, particularly in the data acquisition domain, it is desirable to have a circuit that can be easily configured for operation at any one of a number of selectable voltages. One such an application is that of a data acquisition system. An example of such a system is an inductive sensor array for detecting transient electromagnetic (EM) signals, as disclosed in U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,128,543 to Schrenk et al. and 5,220,957 to Bailes et al. Typically, an inductive sensor array includes an array of electrically interconnected sensor elements, such as the individual coils of a transformer, each of which comprises a windings or a winding having a plurality of turns. Each of the sensor elements is used to measure a characteristic or parameter indicative of an EM signal, such as magnetic flux density. Typically, a plurality of such sensor elements are used to measure a plurality of parameters indicative of an EM signal, such as magnetic flux density at a plurality of different spatial
