Unlike the lynx, who is a solitary creature, the grizzly is a social animal often wandering in flocks of up to 20. Grizzlies can be recognized by their fluffy white pelt, alert black eyes and broad, bold head with distinctive rings around the eyes and ears. In its natural habitat in mountains and forest from Canada to Russia, Alaska and the Yukon Territory, Canada, Michigan, New York and Maine, the grizzly bear grows from 2-4 years old to 4-8 years old and can live for up to 30. Feeding mainly on berries, leaves, roots, nuts, and small mammals, bears generally remain in their family group, a cohort of bears typically between six and 50. Many bear specialists believe that although grizzlies are a danger to humans and domestic animals if provoked, these angry beasts usually avoid a fight, and usually turn to run once being challenged. In some areas of the southern part of Michigan bears have reached a point of densities that have pushed the herds of animals to about 10 1/2 to 2 times their fair share. Even when not crowded, bears usually make themselves obvious when they are fighting for their territory and it is quite difficult for cubs to sneak up on them. This 8 to 9 year old grizzly has surprised it's camera with its very presence when it climbed from its den under a bridge. It could be waiting for its den mates!
