Perhaps, but it is just possible that the international left has no answer to the problem of fascism on the Left, its only response being to join the right-wing assault on the Left. The German left failed to take the problem seriously until, in the early 1930s, Nazism was threatening Germany, perhaps the German left could be rescued from its authoritarian conservatism only by the threat of fascism. Today, both in Europe and the U.S., the left would undoubtedly prefer not to recognize the problem. But what alternative is there? The "left" is now too intertwined in institutions, international organizations, and alliances which are either incompatible with liberalism or simply too powerful and pervasive to overcome. The Left is all too familiar with the "echo-chamber": A Western opinion-maker brings his public to a certain conclusion about a foreign leader. As an echo-chamber, opinion-making leaves out an important player: the foreign leader. It is true that the Western opinion-maker cannot correctly or credibly be described as on the Left, since his employer and the institutions of the West protect him from the danger of Soviet or neo-Nazi terror. But it is a dangerous echo-chamber: the danger that anti-communism spreads. See Robert Conquest's The Great Terror: Stalin�

Clean Up Unused Ports - Baseline Switch 2250 Plus Software 41;Q: Error in Learning Large Scale Deep Learning I am learning deep learning and currently reading an old book on Deep Learning for more than 10 days.I want to share my experience with this small thing which has been irritating me. There is an example given in the book (Image Classification Using Deep Learning) of a Linear Neural Network which its training takes less time compared to a Non-Linear Network.I am not getting the reason behind this,can someone please explain this to me? In the case of Linear Network: weight variables in Training Phase(shown in the picture) where as Non-Linear Network: weight variables in Training Phase(shown in the picture) A: A Linear Network has many more parameters than a nonlinear network does. For example, an affine network has $2*n$ where n is the number of input layers plus the number of hidden layers, and a nonlinear network has $2*n+3n$ parameters. The former has many more parameters, and the training is easier, that's why you can train a linear network to be relatively fast. Q: When is it "proper" to mark "a specific reason?" I'm looking for a specific (but rather formal) reason to say "a particular reason" or "a specific reason" in mathematics and logic. I'm trying to write a language for a text-based learning system, and I want to differentiate between "I'm really about to do X" and "I'm really about to do Y", especially for things such as "I'm really about to get up to the checkout counter". To give some context, I'm trying to write sentences like this: You could have said that you were about to leave, but you didn't, and this is a (particular reason) why. This doesn't look right because of the "but" in the middle of the sentence. I haven't been able to find a rule, phrase, or anything that clearly gives me the answer. I'm particularly concerned about "could have", but "real reason" or " 6d1f23a050
