I'm working on a Chrome extension, and I need it to pull a new version of a JavaScript-only library which is quite limited in API. I want it to update when the new version is downloaded and installed. The problem is that I'm developing it in the chrome extensions area, and I need to go to chrome extensions to manually update it. My question is, is there any way to make it update itself automatically from an external page? I'm using the latest version of Chrome (with Chrome Launcher), but I see that there are older versions of the Chrome Extension Manager UI, but I don't think they will help me. Any ideas? A: There is no clean way to do this. There is a workaround; you could create a "launchpad" page (using chrome.webRequest API) which will be a copy of your "local" page, but which will list all the files you need to change (as is done in the page manager). When these files are changed the launchpad page is updated and 6d1f23a050
