Little is known about the extent of malpractice risk within Iranian emergency medicine (EM) residency programs. This study aimed to determine the risk of malpractice claims among Iranian EM residents and their ability to perceive and avoid malpractice. The study was conducted at a multisite EM residency program in Iran. Forty-nine EM residents were invited to complete a self-report questionnaire that evaluated demographic characteristics, malpractice risk, and the ability to avoid malpractice claims. Forty-four residents (90%) completed the questionnaire. The average time to complete the questionnaire was 6.6 min. In general, the perceived risk of a malpractice claim was 16.3%. Residents reported that they had experienced an EM-related malpractice claim within the past year (10.3%). The majority (85.0%) had experienced an EM-related malpractice claim. Residents' perceived risk of being sued for malpractice was not statistically different from the objective risk of being sued (17.6% vs. 21.0%, p = 0.49). Only 23.1% of residents were aware of the malpractice insurance provided by the department. Knowledge about the malpractice insurance provided by the training hospital decreased the perceived risk of being sued (12.1% vs. 22.4%, p = 0.04). Fourteen residents (31.8%) perceived the risk of being sued to be above the acceptable level, and 32 residents (84.2%) perceived that the risk of being sued did not decrease while on call. Despite high risk perception, 91.7% of residents had an active malpractice insurance. Residents may understate the risk of malpractice. Education for malpractice insurance and increased awareness of the insurance coverage provided by hospitals can help reduce malpractice risk. This study provides baseline information about a possible lack of awareness of the malpractice insurance provided by the training hospital.I've been giving the benefits of the cognitive feedback loop, which I think is the best way to learn anything new, another go.
